Author Susan Cotta believes this book is really about how children can change the world through touch. Though the book is fiction, the results are real; it is based on the actual research conducted by the Upledger Institute, documenting that 'compassionate touch' can actually reduce aggression and increase pro-social behaviors in the schools. It's a way of re-introducing touch in a safe way. The book tells the story of Patrick who slips and falls over a tree root. After his father shows him a special technique called "Compassionate Touch", Patrick brings it to school for show and tell. His class starts a "helping hands" project and soon, even the "bully" is doing the techniques and Patrick starts to see positive changes in the people around him. Written for the 4-8 year old, it makes a fabulous gift or a great addition to any hands-on practice. The book can be found at Left Bank Bookstore, 39 Euclid Ave., St. Louis, ordered through any local bookstore or from the Upledger Institute (800)233-5880.
